The original YMCA building was built on the same site as the present day Y just after the turn of the last century. Architecturally, it looked much like the other buildings of its era, but inside it was state of the art. It was one of the first buildings with electrical wiring and had the most modern light fixtures in town. The gym took up much of the main floor and meeting rooms hosted clubs like the Rotary Club for many years. There was also a pool in the basement. The building and pool were heated by steam from the CNR Shops next door.
